Foreword

"A truly disruptive technology will invade the legal services sector. All we can say about it is that until it appears, no-one will see it coming; and it will not resemble anything people are speculating about today." – Bruce MacEwen, Adam Smith Esq.

Since 2015, Premonition has been issuing regional reports on the performance of law firms and lawyers from around the world. The impact of these reports has been wide-ranging, touching off controversy and debate in domestic legal establishments faced for the first time with the naked statistical truth. Despite strong initial resistance to the idea of a technology business with the audacity to analyze the performance of lawyers and question whether their clients were receiving value, acceptance has set in. In the US and UK in particular, legal analytics is "the new black."

Many general counsel now require performance data from their law firms. This goes beyond customer service questions like, "Was your lawyer responsive and courteous?" to hard outcome and results data. General counsel are asking piercing questions of their lawyers, insurers are seeking data on their insured risks and law firms are playing catch up. A few law firms realize that winning new clients is simple when you can prove you are better than their existing lawyers. Rather than risk falling further behind, displaced firms are reluctantly joining the performance bandwagon.

The Premonition database contains tens of millions of court records from around the globe. In recent years we have added comprehensive records from Canada, the Netherlands, Australia, New Zealand, India and many more specialty courts on our way to becoming the world's largest litigation database, bigger than former market leaders LexisNexis, Thomson Reuters and Bloomberg combined.

More Detail

It is surprising to learn that many of the law firms that publicly tout their expertise in emerging areas of practice such as Bitcoin, autonomous vehicles and drone law have never tried a single case in any of these fields. While our early reports contained just the highlights of the cases in the database (judges, lawyers, parties involved, who won), Premonition now automatically downloads, reads and keeps a copy of every legal document it lays its digital tentacles on. With more than 1.2 million documents filed each day in America alone this is no small feat. Fortunately, the Premonition system can read 50,000 documents in less than a second. Asking the system questions like, "Which law firms and lawyers have actually won cases involving self-driving cars?" and "What were the settlement amounts involved and which judges ruled for which side?" are now simple queries.

Worse Than Random

Things lie exposed in the public record that anyone with a first-class analytics platform can uncover. Without it, parties involved in litigation are flailing in the dark. Our reports have proven, for example, that United Kingdom law firms' choice of barristers was 38% worse than random and General Counsel's choice of law firms was 18% worse than random.

The legal landscape is changing and analytics is driving that change. With only a 3% correlation between higher fees and better performance, the profession is ready for Perception/Reality Arbitrage. The way law firms and lawyers are instructed will never be the same again. Champions will rise, idols will fall.

A.D. could well stand for "After Data".

It is a brave new world, and it will belong to the early adopters.

Canada Courts Report 2017

“Whenever a man can get hold of numbers, they are invaluable: if correct, they assist in informing his own mind.” Charles Babbage

Rarely a week passes without the legal press reporting yet another new initiative in AI, many of them are about how large solicitors' firms are using machine learning to manage documents and their contents. There are also the usual scare stories about how robots might (or might not) take over some of the work lawyers do.

Most of the reports concern qualitative processes and how time-consuming, repetitive tasks can be made easier, better and, tellingly, cheaper. Read what Chrissie Lightfoot, author of The Naked Lawyer, thinks of the current situation here.

There are fewer stories about numbers, or Big Data as it has become known. Maybe that is because numbers seem less headline-worthy than some of the wilder AI stories. Perhaps it's because lawyers are more comfortable with words than numbers. Or maybe it is because there is concern about what quantitative, objective, verifiable data can show about the way the law works.

In the absence of such data about the performance of solicitors, lawyers, expert witnesses, judges and courts, the decision to instruct a lawyer for a case has, traditionally, followed the path of recommendation, reputation and referral. This approach, while useful in the past, no longer meets the market's need for transparency and accessibility. Daniel van Binsbergen of Lexoo shares some views about this here.

There are, of course, more traditional methods that purport to evaluate how a lawyer performs in court. The legal directories all run regular 'awards ceremonies' and rate firms and litigators on the basis of word of mouth. But the validity of these awards is highly questionable, as Sue Bramall of Berners Marketing writes. Recently, Dr. Chris Hanretty, Reader in Politics at the University of East Anglia, published a compelling article about how legal directories entries have little in common with performance data from court appearances.

Similarly, researchers at Liverpool University led by Professor Katie Atkinson have been modelling historical court performance data to predict future case outcomes, with high levels of accuracy.

Premonition has the world's largest legal database, covering many countries and jurisdictions where court results are digitally available. Data from the courts has been electronically crawled, subjected to statistical analysis, and categorized. Canada litigation data represents less than 1% of the total Premonition international legal database.

“If you can’t measure it you can’t manage it.” Peter Drucker

There are those who will dismiss the idea of measuring the performance of a law firm or a lawyer statistically, and feel that this reduces the art and skill of case presentation, advocacy and the mastery of evidence to mere numbers.

Numbers, of course, play a major role in shaping human societies. Very few national governments are entirely without means of tracking the behaviour and opinions of their citizens, and numbers such as social security numbers and the results of opinion polls are closely watched as an aid to social control and central planning.

In science, the habit of either proving a general concept or of quantifying an observed phenomenon requires a sophisticated use of numbers. Making sense of the data available to astronomers, chemists and biologists among others would be impossible without a system of assigning values and weighing variables.

Economically, numbers are central to human activity. Without numbers, there would be no civilization and, to manage any element of that, measurements are required. Any activity can be measured, that data analyzed and decisions taken using the results. The law and legal work is no exception and the availability of data and its analysis can only help improve choice and standards for both practitioners and their clients.

There will be those who argue that the legal processes in the courts are too multi-dimensional to measure; that the weight of evidence will decide; that judges are not infallible; that some lawyers take on only the hardest cases; and that some of the plaintiff or defendant protagonists are surprisingly unreliable on the day. Even so, it is inarguable that those who are on either side of the case want to win. What client goes to the courthouse hoping to lose?

Indeed, the client, especially with the high costs of litigation, is becoming wiser about how law firms and lawyers are chosen to represent them. Those who finance commercial litigation risk a lot by making a bad choice of representation. Read what Peter Petyt and David Vines of 4 Rivers Services say about this here.

There will also be those who will take issue with the concept of ‘winning’ or ‘losing’ a case: perhaps reducing the quantum might have been the best possible result for a client, or an unreported out of court settlement was reached which mitigated a case our system tracks as a loss. These points are for the lawyers concerned to argue and explain when asked about their track record by those clients who have Premonition’s data. Essentially, the traditional ways of choosing legal representation have changed with the increasing influence of AI, Big Data and other irresistible forces. Andrew Weaver of LawyerFair sees this here.

The charts in this report are anonymized. It is not the objective of Premonition’s work to declare any firm or lawyer ‘good’ or ‘bad’ at their jobs but to highlight those with winning track records. Those who subscribe to the detail in the reports will have all the information of the law firms, solicitors and barristers involved in each chosen case. No one, however, expects representation to be instructed on the basis of this information alone. Those who have already subscribed to Premonition data have used it as a major part of their decision process: the performance data is a persuasive, quantitative and objective tool in an otherwise qualitative and subjective process.

This report will concentrate on cases for the three calendar years of 2014, 2015 and 2016. The charts contained will show a scatter of data points representing performance (in terms of winning the case) against the number of times a law firm or lawyer has appeared in the given court. The last three years have been selected for illustrative purposes and, plainly, the more years selected for any court, law firm or lawyer, the more densely populated with data points the chart will be. Similarly, the identity information behind the data points will provide rich detail and information on these litigators and their successes.

Methodology

The purpose of Premonition is to provide shortlists of capable, proven lawyers for selection by the client. It is not an absolute, it's indicative. Factors such as lawyer availability, price, personal chemistry, etc, may all affect individual selection. A client may well feel that sixth of 20 is a better fit than first.

Determining Wins

What constitutes a win is an arguable point. If you call both lawyers on a closed case, both will claim to have 'won'. Every case is arguable. We consulted with a number of lawyers and judges asking them about the general winners and losers for various dispositions types (we have over 100 types in the system). There was broad agreement that judgements went for plaintiffs, dismissals for defendants and settlements shouldn't be counted. All cases are arguable on an individual basis. Premonition is not a 'rocket science' system where we strive for 100% unarguable analysis of every case, its function is to spot trends and outliers, which it does very well as data is 'smoothed out' over thousands of cases.

Case Difficulty

Every case differs in difficulty. Premonition does not assess the difficulty of a case. Lawyers often claim to "only take the toughest cases" when explaining low win rates. Occasionally this is true. Premonition is not designed to identify the 'surgeon' lawyers that only work the hardest cases. However, it does group cases with those of similar difficulty by using case type, sub-type and parties. In the US, Tax Court is notorious for its low win rates against the IRS; however top performing lawyers still stand out, not by their wins, but because they lose less. Cases group by court type, Appeals Court being a more rigorous black letter law venue than small claims, and by judge, where certain cases, (e.g. complex business claims) are assigned to certain judges. Over time, case difficulty variations are also smoothed out over large numbers of cases and lawyers who only take easy cases will de-select themselves when approached.

Multiple Attorney Cases

Premonition picks the first listed lawyer for each side and ignores the others. The system is not perfect, but brings the least overall inaccuracies. In courts where lawyers per party are not identified specifically, it uses an algorithm to predict which lawyer represents which party, then selects the first one for each side to analyze. Co-counsel are not automatically analyzed unless specifically requested by the client.

Gender and Diversity

Premonition matches names to census data and calculates the likely gender and race based on first and last names. On an individual basis, this is highly unreliable. However, at scale, accuracy approaches that of the census itself.

Overall Data Accuracy

In some cases, data entry courthouse issues make it difficult to import every field. Premonition data cannot be more reliable than the public record.

PREMONITION™ Is Seeking A Partner In Canada

Premonition, the World's Largest Litigation database, mines Big Data to find out which Lawyers win before which Judges.

It is a very, very unfair advantage in Litigation.

A quick glimpse at this report should tell you several things:

This has never been done before.

Premonition is the only company in Canada to know which lawyers win before which Judges.

This information is very, very valuable.

Transparency is going to change everything.

Law is currently a Credence Good.

It is nearly impossible for a buyer to judge the quality of legal services they are purchasing either before or after delivery.

Unless they're a Premonition client...

It will become harder and harder to sell a litigator's services without being able to prove their worth.

Litigation and Law Firms will merge with legal analytics.

As the legal market is so opaque and broken, there are huge opportunities for Perception/Reality Arbitrage.

The change will be swift.

The change will be profitable (but only to early adopters).

We're looking for someone who understands this.

Sees the opportunity.

Wants to lead the change.

We're not looking for an employee.

We're looking for a Partner.

It will require hard work.

Every great advancement has its detractors.

If you're up to the task.
